

The Cost of Health Inequity

African American and Hispanic men pay hundreds of billions of dollars more than white men due to health inequities, both in direct costs and indirect costs.

From 2006-2009, health inequities cost African American men over $24 billion.

Improving health outcomes of men of color is not just morally important but also important for economic growth.

CLAS standards aim to eliminate health disparities and promote better health outcomes.